This need is especially acute for transporting a product in a heated or cold environment. Moreover, there have been needs to transport such products in containers that are essentially light-weight, minimize vibration, be inexpensive to manufacture and be attractive and easy for the consumer to use. There are various products and processes known in the art for transporting a product in a heated or cold environment. For example, restaurants typically transport milk and juice in insulated containers to keep the product warm and prevent spoilage. The container has walls that define a cavity to store the product. The container also has a lid. The lid is typically movable between a closed position to seal the cavity and an open position to permit access to the cavity. The container may also have an air space, either above or below the product, to further protect the product from outside elements. The container is generally formed out of a polymer material. The container is generally extruded into a box shape with corners that define various surfaces. The corners are designed to fit together to help seal the container. A typical container has a relatively high cost to manufacture because of the material used and the complexity of the construction. Food distributors and other entities transport products in containers that are inexpensive to manufacture and that are easily recycled or disposed of. For example, cells made out of paperboard are typically used to store products. However, these containers are not structurally durable for shipping and transporting products in a heated or cold environment. The container also does not protect the product from outside elements and cannot be sanitized. Also, such containers are not aesthetically pleasing. There has been a need for a container that is light-weight and can be formed out of inexpensive material. There has also been a need for a container that can be assembled together using simple fasteners. There has also been a need for a container that is structurally durable so that it can be used to transport products in a heated or cold environment. There has also been a need for a container that minimizes vibration and provides a convenient product removal system. unset($data['active'], $data['line'], $
